

Waltur Leads a Horse to Water

Think about what happens in this story. One of the three paragraphs below best tells what the story shows. Circle that paragraph.

Waltur has fun digging holes. He teaches his friend Matilda how to dig holes. She has fun digging holes, too. Then Waltur learns how to count bugs. He thinks that counting bugs is a lot of fun. At the end, Waltur and Matilda count bugs while the horse swims in the water.

Waltur has fun digging holes. He thinks that everybody should love doing this. Waltur leads a horse to water and tries to make it drink, but the horse runs away. Waltur learns that he shouldn't try to make others do what he wants. At the end, Waltur, Matilda, and the horse all have fun.

Matilda wants Waltur to count bugs, but Waltur wants to dig holes. Matilda and Waltur ask a horse which is better, counting bugs or digging holes. The horse cannot decide until it drinks some water. The horse decides that jumping over things is the most fun. At the end, Matilda and Waltur watch the horse jump over things.